The working group led by Alexander Voloshin on creation of an international financial center in Russia has drafted a bill on the main principles of operation of a central depository.

A draft bill on the central depository was first drawn up in May 2007.

One problem was that both the MICEX and RTS exchanges wanted to form their own, rival central depositories. Now that the two exchanges are merging, their two depositories — National Settlement Depository, or NRD, and Depository Clearing Company — will also merge.

The bill addresses interactions between the central depository and the registrar. The central depository will reconcile every operation on a real-time basis, or once a day if there is no activity. The goal is to eliminate discrepancies between the registrar's records and the depository's accounts.
