Russia should stop "dreaming" about economic growth of more than 4 percent, Moskovskiye Novosti reported, citing an interview with Central Bank First Deputy Chairman Alexei Ulyukayev.

Growth is constrained by corruption, administrative barriers, state control of the economy and a flawed legal system, Ulyukayev was quoted as saying by the Moscow-based newspaper.

The country's inflation rate may drop below 7 percent this year and the government will probably run a budget surplus, Ulyukayev said, according to the newspaper.
