

Corruption Risk Seen in State's Funding of Nonprofit Groups

By Natalya Krainova

October 25, 2012

Speaking at a news conference, Yelena Panfilova, pictured here on Dozhd TV, criticized the manner in which state grants are distributed to socially oriented nonprofits.

Transparency International, an anti-corruption watchdog, said Thursday that a government program to distribute funds to socially oriented nonprofit organizations is ripe for abuse because of a lack of transparency and working controls.

In 2011, the Economic Development Ministry used contests to hand out 141.2 million rubles directly to nonprofit groups and 600 million rubles to regional authorities, which redistributed the money to regional nonprofit groups through contests of their own, Transparency International said in a new report.

The law defines a qualifying nonprofit group as one whose activities are directed at solving social problems and developing civil society. The group cannot be a state-owned entity, a political party or a religious organization.

But Transparency International said the contests were riddled with flaws, including "signs of a possible conflict of interest," as when members of contest commissions worked at nonprofits that later received large grants. Another concern was a lack of official online information about the competitions.

The watchdog group also said regional authorities didn't include anti-corruption controls in their contest rules and sometimes changed rules set by the federal government.

"The procedure must be honest and open, not only on paper," Yelena Panfilova, head of Transparency International's Russia office, said in presenting the report at a news conference.

In a number of regions, state officials made up more than 50 percent of the local contest commission, in violation of federal rules, the report said. In one case, a single person headed several nonprofit groups that applied for grants, which wasn't a direct violation of contest rules but didn't "lead to the improvement of the contest's quality," the group said.

Transparency International also found that state-owned organizations had taken part in contests and that the bidding period for some contests was too short.

In all, 53 regions participated in a federal contest to win the right to redistribute federal money, and 49 regions collected funds, the report said.

In addition to the 742.1 million rubles in federal funds, regional governments provided an unknown amount of additional grants, it said.

The Economic Development Ministry didn't offer an immediate comment about the findings.

In April 2010, then-President Dmitry Medvedev signed off on amendments introducing state support for socially oriented nonprofit groups. He submitted the bill to the State Duma in late 2009.

The 2010 law also grants socially oriented nonprofit groups the right to receive support from federal or local authorities in the form of money, property, tax breaks, information, consultations or education.

The nonprofit groups can also accept contracts from state and municipal officials. Companies that provide financial support to the nonprofit organizations qualify for tax breaks under the law.

Related articles:

- \$95.5M Fraud Case Seen as Damaging to Defense Minister
- USAID Gone, Kremlin Tightens Control Over Non-Profits
- Corruption Fight Gets iPhone App

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2012/10/25/corruption-risk-seen-in-states-funding-of-nonprofit-groups-a18872>