

Britain OKs First Russian Extradition in Decade

By Yekaterina Kravtsova

February 14, 2013

The British Foreign Office

British authorities have agreed for the first time in more than a decade to extradite a Russian citizen seeking asylum. The 32-year-old former St. Petersburg resident, accused of beating a man to death, is scheduled to be transferred into Russian custody next week.

Britain has turned down all other requests to extradite Russian asylum seekers, including self-exiled businessmen Yevgeny Chichvarkin and Boris Berezovsky, since President Vladimir Putin took power in 2000.

“This [extradition] case shows that the British authorities considered the accusations brought by Russian authorities to be reasonable,” not politically motivated, said Pavel Chikov, head of the Agora human rights group.

Maxim Vintskevich, who is suspected of participating in the severe beating of a man who later died in a hospital in 2005, was discovered in Britain six years later after being put on an international wanted list, the Prosecutor General's Office said Thursday in a statement. Vintskevich faces up to 15 years in prison.

Lawyer Oleg Degtyaryov of Law Firm Ltd., which specializes in British legal issues involving Russians, said Britain had honored Russian extradition requests in the 1990s, but the failure to honor more recent ones was due to a deterioration in the quality of cases brought by Russian prosecutors. He ruled out that it was due to a cooling of relations between the countries since Putin came to power.

“The fact that Britain doesn't extradite Russians has nothing to do with political tensions between the U.K. and Russia,” he said. “It happens because the Prosecutor General's Office makes absurd and poor cases that have no proof.”

The Prosecutor General's Office statement Thursday called the extradition approval the fifth “positive decision” from British authorities in response to a Russian extradition request since 2006, when a memorandum on cooperation between the General Prosecutor's Office and the Attorney General for England and Wales was signed.

But an undisclosed source in the Prosecutor General's Office told Interfax on Thursday that those other “positive decisions” had not resulted in an actual extradition.

Contact the author at e.kravtsova@imedia.ru

Related articles:

- Brother of 'Primorye Partisan' Seeks Asylum in Netherlands
- Accused Bout Associate Detained in Australia
- Exile Chichvarkin Does Branding for Wine and Politics

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2013/02/14/britain-oks-first-russian-extradition-in-decade-a21575>