The Russian government will issue temporary residence permits to 126,055 foreigners next year.

The government will issue temporary residence permits to 126,055 foreigners next year, according to an order by Prime Minister Dmitry Medvedev, but regions with large numbers of Ukrainian refugees will not receive significant quota increases.

The number of permits for 2015 is based on reports from Russia's regions about their "migration situation and economic conditions," the government said in a note posted Thursday on its website.

The government approved the issue of 95,880 temporary residence permits in 2014, according to an order published in late 2013, but the actual number of permits issued last year totaled 146,627, the government note said Thursday.

The southern Russian regions of Krasnodar and Rostov — major destinations for Ukrainian citizens who have fled the violence between rebels and government forces in their homeland — are scheduled to get relatively low shares of permit quotas.

Rostov, which sheltered more than 45,000 people from Ukraine as of mid-October, according to the TASS news agency, will get 1,000 residence permits — the same as its allocated quota last year.

Krasnodar — a temporary home to nearly 45,000 Ukrainians, according to regional administration data cited by the local Yugopolis news site — will be allocated 3,500 temporary residence permits, according to Medvedev's order. Its quota for this year was set at 2,500.

The Far East, where Russia sends many Ukrainian refugees, will see a slight increase of its quota to 7,780 in 2015, compared to 6,430 allocated for this year.

The city of Moscow will receive 2,000, with another 8,000 for the capital's region. Last year's shares for the areas stood at 2,000 and 7,000, respectively.

Once issued, temporary residency permits last for three years, while certain categories of foreigners — including citizens from Belarus and Turkmenistan, as well as highly trained specialists and their families — can immediately apply for full residency in Russia.
