Opposition activist Ilya Yashin speaks to the media during a presentation of the report about Russian military presence in Ukraine that murdered opposition leader Boris Nemtsov was working on shortly before his death, in Moscow, May 12.

Russian opposition leaders published Tuesday a report initiated by slain Kremlin critic Boris Nemtsov that details alleged Kremlin military involvement in Ukraine and claims hundreds of Russian soldiers have been killed fighting troops loyal to the Kiev government.

Entitled "Putin. War," the 65-page report uses open source material, testimony from soldiers and their relatives and statements from officials to paint a picture of Russia's presence in Ukraine.

A group of journalists and opposition leaders completed the report after Nemtsov was gunned down by the Kremlin walls in a Feb. 27 attack. Some link his research on the subject to his assassination.

"We have gathered exhaustive evidence of the presence of Russian troops in Ukraine," opposition activist and senior member of the opposition RPR–Parnas Party Ilya Yashin said at presentation of the document in Moscow. "This report has one aim: to tell people the truth."

President Vladimir Putin has repeatedly denied Russian troops are operating in eastern Ukraine, where sporadic violence continues despite a cease–fire agreed in February. Putin's spokesman Dmitry Peskov said Tuesday that he had not read the report, Russia's Interfax news agency reported.

According to the document, more than 150 Russian soldiers were killed in August last year as an advance by Ukrainian forces was brought to a bloody halt amid fighting around the town of Ilovaisk, while about another 70 were killed in January and February during a battle around the strategic rail hub of Debaltseve.

"From the very beginning of the conflict the Russian authorities have carefully hidden details about the deaths of citizens of the Russian Federation on the territory of Ukraine," the report said, adding that major separatist military successes were linked to influxes of Russian troops.

As well as sending regular troops, the report alleges the Kremlin organized the recruitment of mercenary brigades in eastern Ukraine where individual soldiers were paid between 60,000 rubles ($1,184) and 90,000 rubles ($1,776) per month. Men in these units were recruited with the help of public groups loyal to the authorities, and paid through funds backed by the Kremlin, the report said.

The report also contains a section written by economist and former Central Bank deputy chairman Sergei Aleksashenko about the financial cost of Russia's role in Ukraine.

Aleksashenko estimated that Russia spent 53 billion rubles ($1 billion) to provide men and materials for the war in southeastern Ukraine, 80 billion rubles ($1.6 billion) to help Ukrainian refugees and 2 trillion rubles ($39.4 billion) on subsidies for Crimea, the formerly Ukrainian peninsula annexed by Moscow between February and March 2014 with the help of Russian soldiers.

Other sections in the report address the role of Russian propaganda, the humanitarian crisis in eastern Ukraine, the downing of Malaysian Airlines flight MH17 and the process of the annexation of Crimea.

The report's co–authors said that their main aim was to inform people about Russia's involvement in Ukraine, and highlight Putin's changing rhetoric over the role of Russian troops.

Nemtsov produced several similar documents, including one looking at corruption ahead of the 2014 Winter Olympics in Sochi, in recent years. Yashin said Tuesday that similar reports would continue to be produced, with the next one likely to focus on Chechen strongman Ramzan Kadyrov.

Just 2,000 copies of the report have been printed. Organizers are looking to raise funds inside Russia for a larger print run. The report is also available online.

Yashin told reporters that there were difficulties expanding and realizing Nemtsov's work because witnesses were afraid to speak out, researchers had been threatened, and that there had been problems finding a company willing to print the document. The report was unavailable online for much of Tuesday because of what Yashin wrote on Twitter was a denial-of-service (DoS) attack.

"They can't shut our mouths," said Yashin. "Are we scared? We're not crazy."
