A Russian Foreign Ministry official has said that the country may be compelled to increase its nuclear capacities in response to the United States' alleged attempts to undermine international disarmament efforts, the RIA Novosti state news agency reported Sunday.

"Negative trends that undermine strategic stability and the prospects of nuclear disarmament are taking hold in the world," Mikhail Ulyanov, head of the Foreign Ministry's department for non-proliferation and arms control, was quoted by RIA Novosti as saying. "These negative factors do not come from us. They come from the United States."

Ulyanov cited the United States' missile defense program Prompt Global Strike, its reluctance to ratify the Comprehensive Nuclear-Test-Ban Treaty and a "serious imbalance" of conventional weapons in Europe as factors that could compel Russia to increase its nuclear potential, but added that this was not the case for the time being.

Last week, NATO military commander Philip Breedlove accused Russia of making irresponsible nuclear threats, media reported at the time.

President Vladimir Putin said in March that Russia had been prepared to put its nuclear forces on alert to ensure the annexation of Crimea. A Foreign Ministry official also said that month that the country had the right to deploy its nuclear arsenal to Crimea, although he was not aware of any plans to do so.

Meanwhile, in another iteration of heightened military rhetoric, Alexander Grushko, Russia's envoy to NATO, said last week that Russia was prepared to bolster its military presence in Crimea to counter the organization's increased activities in eastern Europe, RIA Novosti reported.

Poland and the Baltic states — Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania — said last week that they were seeking the establishment of permanent NATO deployments on their territories to deter Russian military activity.

These NATO states have repeatedly accused Russian fighter jets and military ships of lingering at their borders. Earlier this month, Latvia's military claimed that two Russian naval ships, a military transportation aircraft and a submarine were lurking on the edge of the country's territorial waters. Lithuania has also complained of Russian naval activity in its exclusive economic zone.
