Moscow police are investigating the “No Pants Subway Ride” flashmob that reportedly took place on Sunday, the TASS news agency reported Monday, citing the Moscow police press office.

Law enforcement officers are currently looking for participants of the stunt, which involved several young people riding a subway train wearing no pants.

“[The police are] trying to figure out whether their actions can be classified as a misdemeanor,” an unidentified spokesperson from the Moscow police headquarters told TASS.

At the same time an unidentified source at the police told the RIA Novosti state-run news agency that the flashmob participants can be charged with violating laws that regulate public events, and, therefore, might face a fine of 20,000 rubles ($267) or 15 days behind bars.

According to the Moscow Metro press office, unidentified participants of the flashmob took a train on the Dark Green (Zamoskvoretskaya) line, “having undressed to their underwear beforehand.”

“Despite the popularity of the event in some cities, not everyone is ready to share the motives of its participants and [repeat] their actions. The administration of the Moscow Metro calls on passengers to respect each other and observe generally accepted rules of public behavior,” metro spokespeople told TASS.
