

Yatsenyuk Ouster Fails in Ukraine

By The Moscow Times

February 17, 2016

Oleh Barna, a Ukrainian lawmaker from the Block of Petro Poroshenko, second right, tries pull Ukrainian Prime Minister Arseniy Yatsenyuk out from the podium during his speech as other two lawmakers try to spot him at a parliamentary session in the Parliament in Kiev, Ukraine.

Ukrainian Prime Minister Arseniy Yatsenyuk and his government have survived a no confidence vote in parliament despite being asked by the country's president hours earlier to resign.

A no confidence motion gathered 194 votes on Tuesday, falling short of the 226 needed to pass.

Yatsenyuk has been criticized for the slow pace of reforms, and his government's rating have collapsed amid an economic crisis.

The failure of the no-confidence motion means the government will likely survive until the next session of parliament starts in September. Ukrainian law allows only one such vote per session, according to news reports.

But the situation is likely to remain unstable. The vote appeared to highlight division between Yatsenyuk and President Petro Poroshenko, both of whom have been accused of pandering to corrupt officials and oligarch businessmen since rising to power following popular protests in 2014.

The motion was initiated by Yuri Lutsenko, parliamentary head of the pro-presidential Petro Poroshenko Bloc faction. It followed demands by Poroshenko for a “total reboot” and “reformatting” of the government and Yatsenyuk's resignation, the Meduza news website reported Tuesday citing a statement by the president.

Despite surviving the vote, the government was weakened on Wednesday when the Fatherland party led by former Prime Minister Yulia Tymoshenko left the ruling coalition.

Tymoshenko branded the government “untenable” and urged ministers to resign.

"The party and the faction find it unacceptable to be in this pack, which has no chance to carry out reforms and reboot all of our lives" she was quoted by the TASS news agency as saying.

Fatherland's exit leaves the remaining three parties in the coalition with a majority, though it is unclear whether any other party will follow suit.

Original url: <https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2016/02/17/yatsenyuk-ouster-fails-in-ukraine-a51848>