

Moscow TV Round-Up: Warm Up with Jazz, Literary Lives of the Rich and Famous, and Fabulous Lunatics

By Mark H. Teeter

January 09, 2017

Robert Redford in the 1974 version of "The Great Gatsby" YouTube

It's Contrasting Pairs Week on Moscow TV, as viewers await the Old New Year huddled together in drafty apartments, drawing warmth from the glow of their small screens. Stay put while it's a blustery minus 30 degrees Celsius outside and watch two good movies of Russian and American classic novels; two good Russian and British jazz bands of the 1930s; and two good 'n' dysfunctional Russian heroes of the pre-perestroika and post-Soviet eras. Here's the where and when:

It's been said that every generation has to reinvent the classics for itself, and on Monday Kultura shows two Russian and American generations doing just that with "Fathers and Children” and “The Great Gatsby.” The Turgenev classic has been filmed three times, at neat 25-year intervals: 1958, 1983 and 2008. All three have their merits, but Vyacheslav Nikiforov’s 1983 four-part serial starting Monday morning is the longest, most elaborate and probably the best (USSR State Prize, 1986). No one has yet matched Vladimir Bogin’s rendition of the iconic nihilist Bazarov – which sets a high standard for the next Bazarov portrayer in 2033.

“Gatsby” was likewise filmed generationally – 1926, 1949, 1974 and 2000 – before the impatient Baz Luhrmann produced his extravagant half-generational entry in 2013. Kultura is airing the estimable 1974 Jack Clayton version, which won a nice collection of hardware (including two Oscars) and features some of the best supporting performances to date. True, Robert Redford was not a natural Gatsby – Leonardo DiCaprio did rather better at putting flesh on the bones of Fitzgerald’s ever-elusive hero – but the production did good box office and won extravagant praise from no less an authority on iconic Americana than Tennessee Williams.

Fathers and Children Отцы и дети. Kultura, Monday-Thursday at 11:15 a.m.

The Great Gatsby Великий Гэтсби. Kultura, Monday at 3:10 p.m.

On Wednesday viewers get a pair of dysfunctional heroes they can’t help but love in Afonya

(1975) and Inadequate People (2010). Provincial plumber Afonya Borshchov was a watershed figure in Soviet film, a work-shirking, bribe-taking, street-fighting, skirt-chasing, self-centered drunk who would rather leave an entire apartment building without water than work unpaid overtime. Yet a pretty nurse named Katya falls for him – and so did the Soviet public, who made the film the USSR’s box office champ of 1975. Tune in Wednesday morning and see how alchemist-director Georgy Danelia mixed

Aleksandr

Borodyansky’s offbeat script

, charismatic star Leonid Kuravlyov and a star-studded supporting cast to create a Stagnation-era smash about the most lovably un-Soviet hero you’ll ever meet.

Then in the evening move on to the post-Soviet hero-misfit Vitaly M., a seemingly normal 30-something Muscovite who harbors serious anger management problems. Fortunately, they become seriously funny problems thanks to a clever script and razor-sharp dialogue by writer-director Roman Karimov. “People” won five festival awards and did fine art house business, which fits well with its Coen Bros. sensibility: the best laughs sneak up on you sideways, as the audience gradually discovers that not just reluctant romantic Vitalik, but every major character in the movie is therapy-worthy – and somehow we feel much better watching each get treated in their own way.

Afonya Afonya. Dom Kino, Wednesday at 7:20 a.m.

Inadequate People Неадекватные

люди. Kino TV, Wednesday at 7:10 p.m.

On Friday Moscow TV offers proof that jazz had become universal by the mid-1930s, airing Grigori Aleksandrov's

Jolly Fellows (1934) and Alfred J. Goulding's Everything Is Rhythm

(1936). "Fellows," the USSR's first musical comedy, was a breakthrough for Soviet cinema on multiple fronts: not only did the film center on a jazz band, it featured rather bourgeois-looking Soviet vacationers, alcohol-assisted shenanigans, people running around in their underwear and a great deal of outright silliness

.

All this had its producers good and worried as the film approached its official reviews, but "Fellows" came through studio-censor and Kremlin screenings unscathed. Stalin reportedly sat through the movie in silence, then announced over the credits, "It's a light, happy picture. I feel like I've been on vacation." Take the tyrannical hint! With its inspired wackiness, "Fellows" is the perfect way to warm up the atmosphere in your frigid Moscow apartment.

America's touring Original Dixieland Jass Band was a revelation to London audiences in 1919. Among those most impressed was one Harry Roy, a young clarinet and alto sax player from Stamford Hill who formed a popular group in the 1920s and became a fixture of the British jazz scene. Friday morning Kultura airs Goulding's "Rhythm" in its Masterpieces of Early Cinema series, the first of two movies that featured Roy and his music. While it's really not a cinematic masterpiece, "Rhythm" includes some period performances that are fine indeed: the eight musical numbers by Harry Roy and his Band, Princess Pearl (Roy's wife), Mabel Mercer ("Black Minnie's Got the Blues") and others give you an idea of the state of the art (and the influence of Busby Berkeley) – and they also prepare you for James Seymour's subsequent Roy vehicle "Rhythm Racketeer" (1937), which may well be a favorite of our piano-playing president.

Jolly Fellows

Весёлые ребята. Родное кино, Friday at 7:25 a.m.

Everything Is Rhythm Все это – ритм. Kultura, Friday at 10:20 a.m.

Mark H. Teeter is the editor of Moscow TV Tonight on Facebook.

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2017/01/09/moscow-tv-round-up-warm-up-with-jazz-literary-lives-of-the-rich-and-famous-and-fabulous-lunatics-a56754>