

Potential for New Wave of Protests in Russia is Growing, Report Says

October 11, 2018

Igor Glazunov / TASS

A new report authored by analysts who correctly predicted mass anti-government rallies in 2012 has said that the potential for new nationwide protests against the Russian government is growing.

The report's authors — economist Mikhail Dmitriyev and sociologist Sergei Belanovsky — detailed plummeting support for the ruling elite and growing public discontent in March 2011, less than a year before anti-Kremlin protests broke out.

Related article: Putin's Managed Democracy Falters \(Op-ed\)

This year, Dmitriyev, Belanovsky and psychologist Anastasia Nikolskaya said Russians were shifting their focus from pride in military might to domestic issues.

Russia's new law delaying the working population's retirement age by five years has triggered dormant anti-government attitudes to potentially long-term unrest, they said in the report published Thursday.

The authors identified three major indicators of looming protests: major readiness for change, growing demand for "justice" and a shift toward self-reliance.

"Readiness for rapid and adventurous changes coupled with calls for abstract justice points toward a growing desire to seek unrealistic social and economic solutions while ignoring their risks and possible costs," the report states.

The authors said their research methods – combining focus groups with psychological tests and existing sociological research – helped them accurately predict mass protests in 2011.

Belonovsky told the RBC news website that existing financial, social and environmental issues could contribute to widespread unrest.

"There are risks that if the number of such incidents exceeds a critical mass of 10-20 at one time, the federal authorities won't be able to cope," he said.

The report was published by the Committee of Civil Initiatives, founded by former Finance Minister and Russia's current chief auditor Alexei Kudrin.

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2018/10/11/potential-new-wave-protests-russia-growin-report-says-a63163>