

Moscow Officials Sued For Allowing Gay Couple to Adopt

July 19, 2019

Pixabay

Russia's Investigative Committee has accused social welfare officials in Moscow of criminal negligence for allowing a gay couple to raise children they adopted nearly a decade ago.

Russia banned gay adoption, along with "homosexual propaganda among minors," in 2013.

Related article: Same-Sex Adoptions Will Lead to Human Extinction, Russian Speaker Says

The Investigative Committee said this week that it has opened a criminal negligence case against officials in southeast Moscow for allowing a gay man "cohabiting with another man" to adopt two children in 2010.

It accused the unnamed Maryino district officials of "failing to take appropriate measures to protect minors from information harmful to their health and development."

"[The foster parent] promotes non-traditional relationships, forming distorted ideas about family values in children,” the Investigative Committee said Wednesday, accusing the man of “harming their health and moral and spiritual development.”

The unidentified Moscow officials that allowed the adoption face up to three months of arrest.

The adoptive parents have not yet been sued but could face charges under Russia’s “propaganda” law, Maxim Olenichev, a Vykhod LGBT rights group lawyer, told Germany’s Deutsche Welle broadcaster.

One of the parents reportedly works at the prestigious Moscow-based Higher School of Economics (HSE) and the family is said to be “well off.” The children, aged 12 and 14, “feel comfortable and safe” and there were no “indications of violence in the family,” DW quoted Olenichev as saying.

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2019/07/19/moscow-officials-sued-allowing-gay-couple-adopt-a66477>