

Grassroots Volunteer Programs Help Battle Coronavirus in Russia

COVID-19 is spreading fast – but so is the volunteer movement to help combat it

By Andreas Rossbach

April 02, 2020

Young volunteers are doing shopping for elderly people who must stay at home for their safety.
VolunteerMedics

"This is your chance to help people who need to stay at home now to be safe," says Russian actor Nikita Kukushkin in a video watched by more than 300,000 people. Kukushkin shows what he's doing to help his neighbors: leaving canned and packaged food in a bag for anyone to take, asking them to leave notes about what they need. Kukushkin's goal: to create an Instagram flashmob using the hashtag #ЯВПОМОЩЬ (#IComeToHelp).

Kukushkin is not the first to mobilize people to help their neighbors or strangers survive the pandemic. The online volunteer project #covidarnost — a play on solidarity and COVID — uses the platforms of Telegram and VKontakte — a popular Russian social media platform like Facebook — to help people get assistance in their neighborhood. It provides not only services like grocery shopping, but psychological counseling as well. Sasha Krylenkova, one of the project initiators, told The Moscow Times that, “What with the pandemic and related restrictive measures, we can't even imagine what challenges we will have to deal with. So the most important thing now is to help and get help from our neighbors, people close to us.”

Daniil Pospelov, a volunteer at #covidarnost, told The Moscow Times that he wasn't worried about getting the virus. He said he started volunteering when he realized the scale of the problem. "I have some time. I understand the seriousness of the problem, and some friends asked if I wanted to help with #Covidarnost. So I got involved."

Embed:

The image shows a placeholder for an Instagram post embed. It features a profile picture icon in the top left corner, a large Instagram logo in the center, and a blue link that says "View this post on Instagram" below the logo. At the bottom, there are several horizontal bars representing the content of the post, which are currently blurred out.

Актер Никита Кукушкин запускает флешмоб #ЯВПОМОЩЬ — это ваш шанс помочь тем, кому сейчас гораздо безопаснее сидеть дома. Пожилым людям необходимо изолироваться, чтобы не заболеть, но часто им некого попросить принести продукты или лекарства. Это можете сделать вы — любым доступным вам способом: оставив коробку с необходимыми вещами в подъезде, или спросив соседей, не нужно ли им принести что-то из аптеки. Может, вы придумаете свой способ помочь? Расскажите о нем: выкладывайте фото и видео с хештегом #ЯВПОМОЩЬ

A post shared by Телеканал Дождь (@tvrain_inside) on Mar 25, 2020 at 10:44am PDT

In another volunteer project, supported by the Russian government, companies and volunteers teamed up for the #МЫВМЕСТЕ (eng. #Wearetogether) initiative. Started by Volunteer Medics, the Association of Volunteer Centers and the online platform dobro.ru, there are now 9,000 volunteers, 700 companies and groups involved. There is a free telephone number people can call to request assistance. Homebound elderly people or others who should not go outside call and ask for volunteers to help them with errands, shop for them, or assist them in other ways.

"Our movement is made up of people who are not indifferent — volunteers, entrepreneurs and anyone who wants to unite to support other people during this pandemic," a Volunteer Medics spokesperson told The Moscow Times. Volunteers sign up on the #МЫВМЕСТЕ website to buy groceries or medications and deliver them straight to the door of the person in need. In about a week, volunteers created aid headquarters in every Russian region.

Armen Avakyan, who volunteers with Volunteer Medics in Moscow, joined right away. "They could use all the help they could get, so I signed up immediately. We get instructed on what to wear, and we have enough antiseptic and gloves."

Another non-governmental organization (NGO), Civic Assistance Committee, has started to deliver groceries to refugees and migrant families. The NGO Nasiliu.net (Stop.Violence) continues to provide assistance on hotlines to help women and families in need. "As the quarantine begins, we are about to sail into a perfect storm of domestic violence," said Anna Rivina, head of Nasiliyu.nyet. "So it's important to continue our work online." She is, however, realistic about the limited help they can provide right now. "I am worried that we are bad at tracking domestic violence in normal times, let alone during a pandemic," she said.

Nochlezhka (Shelter) provides aid to homeless people. Daria Baybakova, head of the Moscow branch of Nochlezhka, told The Moscow Times that, "We expect a growth of homeless people, which usually happens in a crisis. At the same time, donations are decreasing due to the difficult financial situation. We realize that we have a hard time ahead," she said. But she added that "our projects that help to meet basic needs are continuing so people have food and don't have to sleep on the street. We do face the major challenge of hygiene. Our volunteers are trying to minimize the number of people in the same place to protect people from being infected with the coronavirus."

Some cultural institutions and businesses are also offering their help. Theaters, museums and concert halls are making online performances available, like the legendary Bolshoi Theater in Moscow broadcasting its best classic performances online for free. Yandex Taxi is offering free rides to doctors. And the group Shishki is inviting people for a drink in an online bar on the online platform "Stay The F Home Bar."

The idea of mutual aid has a long history in Russia. In 1902 Peter Kropotkin, a Russian philosopher, historian, and anarchist published a collection of essays called, "Mutual Aid: A Factor of Evolution." Unlike naturalist and biologist Charles Darwin, the father of the evolutionary theory based on "natural selection" and "survival of the fittest," Kropotkin argued that survival is based on solidarity, or as he put it, "the close dependency of everyone's happiness upon the happiness of all."

Whether or not volunteers have read Kropotkin's book or even heard of him, his notion of "mutual aid" is being revived today as Russia faces the coronavirus pandemic.

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2020/04/02/grassroots-volunteer-programs-help-battle-coronavirus-in-russia-a69831>