

Consumer Spending Approaches Pre-Coronavirus Levels

Sberbank payments data shows spending levels are just 8% down on last year.

June 17, 2020

Consumer spending is creeping back, but shopping habits could have changed for good. Sergei Vedyashkin / Moskva News Agency

Russians have started returning to shops, restaurants and hairdressers following the easing of lockdown restrictions, sending consumer spending back towards pre-coronavirus levels.

Aggregated payments data from Russia's largest bank, Sberbank, shows spending over the last week was down around 8% compared with the same period in 2019 — a significant bounceback from levels recorded in April and May. Retail sales as recorded by Russia's federal statistics agency Rosstat — a different, but comparable indicator — were down 23% in April.

In the second week of June, spending on goods was actually 4.4% higher than in 2019, Sberbank found, while outlays on services was still a third lower.

Related article: Coronavirus in Russia: The Latest News | June 17

Russia has begun relaxing lockdown restrictions, with each region determining exactly which measures should stay in force, based on the spread of the virus and capacity of hospitals in their area. Shops in Moscow were allowed to open at the beginning of June, hairdressers got back to work a week later, and restaurants and cafes opened their summer terraces Tuesday.

Sberbank analysts said spending was now comparable to a quiet working day in 2019.

Despite the recovery, smaller businesses are still reeling from the effects of the pandemic. Small business activity is still down 29% compared with the same period in 2019, Sberbank said. In Moscow, the fall is even greater, at 38% — a sign that larger businesses are faring better as Russia emerges from the largest global economic shock in more than two decades.

Early figures show Russians are also adjusting where they spend following the coronavirus pandemic and hit to living standards, becoming more price conscious. The market share of budget label foods has begun to creep up, while sales of higher price items have slipped back. Surveys also show that consumers plan to spend less eating at restaurants and cafes, and more time cooking at home — a trend that could further hurt Russia's small businesses and dent the pace of the recovery, should it materialize.

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2020/06/17/consumer-spending-approaches-pre-coronavirus-levels-a70602>