"I apologize to my readers, colleagues, friends and everyone I let down," Prostakov wrote in his social media post announcing he was stepping down as the opposition news website's chief editor.

Prostakov's ex-girlfriend, who accused him of rape, catalyzed the slew of Twitter threads alleging sexual harassment by men in media and other industries. Several other users accused Prostakov of groping and harassing them at work meetings and parties.

At least one post alleged that Prostakov and MBKh Media's photo editor were involved in a gang rape at a party about five years ago.

The photo editor apologized for his past behavior but characterized the alleged gang rape as "group sex by mutual consent." Prostakov said he had no recollection of that night, saying he was under the influence of alcohol.

MBKh Media has not yet addressed the allegations.

The claims are the latest in a string of harassment allegations at some of Russia's main liberal media outlets in recent years. In 2018, the Meduza news website's chief editor briefly resigned following claims of groping a colleague's wife at a party. This year, the longtime chief editor of the Ekho Moskvy radio station faced accusations of making unwanted advancements — claims he apologized for but denied wrongdoing.

All three of the outlets were instrumental in a 2018 campaign to boycott State Duma lawmaker Leonid Slutsky, who was accused of sexually harassing at least five female journalists. A parliamentary ethics commission dismissed the claims and Slutsky continues to serve in Russian parliament.
