

French Champagne Houses Cry Foul Over Russian Label Rule

By AFP

July 05, 2021

Bottles of Russian "Champagne" are seen in a small shop in central Moscow. Alexander Nemenov / AFP

Champagne houses in France on Monday issued a plea for diplomatic help over a new Russian law reserving the term "champagne" for Russian-produced sparkling wines, which interrupted supplies from the local market leader Moët Hennessy.

French producers are fiercely jealous of the AOC, or Controlled Appellation of Origin, that is supposed to give them exclusive use of the word in countries that adhere to the Lisbon Agreement on distinctive geographical indications.

Related article: Russian Law Takes Fizz Out of French Champagne Supplies

But Russia is not a signatory, and on Friday President Vladimir Putin signed a law that will forbid the use of the Russian translation of champagne — "Shampanskoe" — on imported bottles.

French producers can still use the word in French, but will also have to write "sparkling wine" in Cyrillic on the back of bottles—a heresy for brands that say nothing on Earth can match their distinctive bubbly.

"The Champenois call on French and European diplomats to obtain a change of this unacceptable law," the Champagne Committee, which groups grape growers as well as producers in France's northeastern Champagne region, said in a statement.

It denounced a "scandalous" move that "calls into question more than 20 years of bilateral talks between the European Union and Russia on the protection of AOCs."

Moët Hennessy, owned by the luxury conglomerate LVMH, said Sunday that it would comply with the law and would resume exports of its brands, including Dom Pérignon, Moët & Chandon and Veuve Clicquot, "as soon as possible."

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2021/07/05/french-champagne-houses-cry-foul-over-russian-label-rule-a74431>