

Moscow Stock Exchange Partially Reopens After One-Month Closure

By AFP

March 24, 2022

The RTS Index, which is calculated in U.S. dollars, was down over 4.0% since markets opened.

Vyacheslav Prokofyev/TASS

The Moscow Stock Exchange resumed trading of some shares Thursday, the second stage in a phased re-opening after being suspended for a month due to Russia's military operation in Ukraine.

Trading renewed for only 33 of the largest companies that make up the ruble-denominated MOEX Russia Index, which saw gains of 10% at opening but closed at 4.4%.

The RTS Index, which is calculated in U.S. dollars, was down 9.0% as markets closed.

The companies trading on Thursday include Russian energy giants Gazprom and Rosneft, and the country's largest banks Sberbank and VTB, which are under U.S. sanctions.

Other companies trading on the market included metals giants Nornickel and Rusal, several private companies and Russia's flag-carrier airline Aeroflot.

The Moscow exchange suspended trading hours after President Vladimir Putin sent thousands of troops into pro-Western Ukraine on Feb. 24.

It started a phased re-opening on Monday with trading in federal government bonds, after the longest hiatus since the fall of the Soviet Union.

Related article: Russian Economy Facing 'Massive Structural' Challenges, Central Bank Says

Russia's Central Bank said Wednesday that trading would be limited to just over four hours and short selling would be banned in an effort to prevent speculative deals.

Foreigners are not allowed to sell their shares, as part of measures taken by Russia to stem the flight of foreign currency and capital.

Timothy Ash, an emerging markets strategist at BlueBay Asset Management, said Russian authorities have made a "concerted effort" to stabilise the domestic market and "ease the feeling of panic which came with the market collapse" after the initial sanctions.

But he said this "deeply managed" reopening is "really only window dressing" as the sanctions are "proving really painful."

While the "Russian financial markets might stabilize in the short term," few foreigners will want to invest there, he said, since "Putin has made Russia like toxic waste."

Russia has been hit by Western sanctions that have pummelled the ruble and threatened to cause the government to default on its foreign debt.

U.S. sees 'charade'

For analyst Mikhail Ganelin of investment company Aton, the gradual re-opening of the markets is an opportunity for Russians to protect their savings and hedge them against galloping inflation.

"Using the market as a long-term investment is the right thing to do," Ganelin told AFP, adding that "markets will recover sooner or later, sooner or later there will be some kind of political stabilization."

"There are not many savings opportunities now. The stock market is one good tool for saving investments."

To aid recovery, the Russian government has pledged the equivalent of $10 billion to buy up shares of Russian companies and Putin said Wednesday Moscow will now only accept ruble payments from Europe for deliveries of Russian gas.

"What we're seeing is a charade: a Potemkin market opening," U.S. Deputy National Security Advisor Daleep Singh said in a statement Thursday.

He said Russia will "only allow 15% of listed shares to trade."

"Russia has made it clear they are going to pour government resources into artificially propping up the shares of companies that are trading," he added.

In a bid to stabilize the ruble, the Central Bank last month more than doubled its key interest rate to 20%.

The sanctions also sparked an exodus of foreign companies from Russia, including H&M, McDonald's and IKEA.

Officials in Moscow have sought to downplay the gravity of the Western penalties, promising that Russia will adapt. Putin has said that the country will emerge stronger from the crisis.

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2022/03/24/moscow-stock-exchange-partially-reopens-after-one-month-closure-a77060>