The Moscow City Court rejected Tuesday an appeal against the arrest of Wall Street Journal reporter Evan Gershkovich, the first foreign journalist to be charged with espionage in Russia since the Cold War.

The hearing was the first time Gershkovich has been seen in public since his arrest in the Ural Mountains city of Yekaterinburg last month.

The WSJ reporter was dressed in a plaid shirt and blue jeans and did not say anything to journalists.

The arrest of Gershkovich has sent relations between Washington and Moscow to a new low, with U.S. President Joe Biden telling Russia that the journalist should be released immediately.

The United States' ambassador to Russia, Lynne Tracy, was one of those present at the hearing.

"It was hard for me to see an innocent journalist being held in such conditions. Yesterday I was allowed to see him for the first time in the pre-trial detention center and he is healthy and holding on despite the circumstances," Tracy told journalists at the hearing, independent outlet Mediazona reported.

"We will continue to help him and demand consular access."

Accused of espionage for the United States, Gershkovich was detained in Yekaterinburg on March 29.

Gershkovich's defense team has denied all the accusations against him.

About 30 Russian and foreign journalists were present at the appeal, but not all were allowed into the courtroom.

Gershkovich was represented in court by lawyers Tatiana Nozhkina and Maria Korchagina, independent media outlet Meduza reported.

A few hours before the start of the appeal, reports suggested that activist Yaroslav Shirshikov, who first reported Gershkovich's detention and who apparently helped Gershkovich with reporting in Yekaterinburg, had been detained on terrorism charges.

A few days after Gershkovich's detention, the Federal Security Service (FSB) announced the arrest of a couple who worked at tank factory Uralvagonzavod in Nizhny Tagil — also reportedly visited by Gershkovich shortly before his arrest — on allegations of assisting Ukrainian intelligence.

Surveillance of Gershkovich was managed by the FSB's counterintelligence department, which sent a special team to Yekaterinburg to carry out his arrest.
